

Exploring new avenues: Global health, democracy, and digital transformation

To The Editor,

We read the insightful article titled “Democracy, economics, or health -Time to look to the east for leadership” published in the Journal of Family Medicine and Primary Care with great interest^[1]. As we read through its insightful arguments, we were captivated by the compelling case it made for exploring alternative approaches to international cooperation.

An engaging article delves into the concept of multilateralism within the domain of health, underscoring the imperative of prioritizing the pursuit of global solidarity.^[2] An insightful study outlines specific advantages that democracies have in coping with the pandemic.^[3]

Shedding light on how digital technologies and Industry 4.0 tools can wield a transformative impact on the global landscape, this paper highlights their potential.^[4]

The G20 nations have the potential to make a significant contribution to improving global health.^[5]

At this juncture, the confluence of circumstances compels us to rally as one, marshaling our collective endeavors, and forging a trail toward a brighter horizon for the world's well-being.
